The topic is of great interest as it examines the gender dimensions of roles and activities performed by male and female workers at the Cameroon Development Cooperation. The topic is relevant and contemporary considering the disparity in gendered division of labour resulting in job segregation that impacts male and female gender differently. The study will be significant to the scientific community as it will bring to the fore the lived realities of male and female workers in the Debundscha palm plantation estate, an area that might have not been sufficiently acknowledged in literature. The study is also important because arising from the findings, it suggested strategies for addressing gender inequalities in plantation agriculture.

Optional/General comments	The section on the introduction was logically written. However, the researcher should engage more current literature in order to bring the work up to date. The research methodology fits into the research objectives and questions. However, section 2.1 under the research methodology should be renamed “Research area or Area of the study”. Under the 2.2 research design, a more detailed information is needed to explain and justify how the sample size of 50 was arrived at. Further justification is needed for the choice of 24 male and 26 female respondents. There is also the need to situate the scope of the study within a given time frame. This will make for a clear understanding of the period under study .i.e. what time frame constitute Pre and Post Anglophone crisis. From the study it was clear from the introduction that the Anglophone crisis began in 2016 however it was not clear the period referred to as the Pre-Anglophone crisis era. The study needs to be clear on this because one can have different assumption as to what constitute the period covered by this study. Flowing from the above in the analysis section it was difficult to differentiate between the gendered situation in the Pre and Post Anglophone Crisis era.
